

Critical Review: Is there evidence to support that hearing aids benefit adults in the reduction of tinnitus perception?

Lam, H.

M.Cl.Sc (AUD.) Candidate

The University of Western Ontario: School of Communication Sciences and Disorders

The aim of this critical review is to examine the literature regarding the effectiveness of hearing aids in the reduction of tinnitus perception. Study designs include: mixed (between and within) measures (pre-post test), between groups and single group pre-post test. Current research suggests the fitting of hearing aids not only benefit helps in the reduction of tinnitus that often accompany the loss. This finding may persuade those individuals not willing to accept a hearing aid to support their

Data Collection

A review of the literature yielded four studies: mixed

