WRITING THE MEDIEVAL BODY

The course will focus on sexuality and illness in the medical, religious, and literary discourses from the twelfth to the sixteenth centuries. Of particular interest will be the development of medieval technical literature (Fachliteratur) as it moved from the monastery to the university and with its preference for prose distanced itself from the "less truthful" texts (romances, poetry, fabliaux, etc.) which were written in verse. Works studied in the course will be examples in which two or more of the discourses converge or collide, starting with Hildegard von Bingen's medical treatise Causae et Curae from the twelfth century. Literary works from the classical Middle High German period will be studied in combination with their foreign, in particular French, forerunners or parallels. They will include Gottfried von Strassburg's Tristan, in which women healers, a love potion, and trial by ordeal figure prominently, Hartmann von Aue's Iwein in whose protagonist suffers from madness, Der Arme Heinrich with a protagonist afflicted by leprosy, and Gregorius which features double incest. In the medical works of medieval and Renaissance school medicine the emphasis will be on sexuality and procreation, two areas in which the religious discourse is never completely absent as Maino de Maino's Regimen sanitatis and Jakob Rueff's gynecological work Hebammenbuch illustrate. The course will conclude with a look at the representations of the body in the fabliaux and Shrovetide plays of Hans Sachs.
