This course considers some of the most important problems in the theory of knowledge, from a selection of classical and contemporary viewpoints. In this way we will gain some insight into the origins, motivations, and evolution of these problems as well as their implications for contemporary thought. Topics will include the nature of perception, the relation between sense and reason, scepticism and certainty, knowledge of language, deductive and non-deductive inferences, sense and scientific knowledge. Although there is some familiarity with philosophical texts will be assumed.
