appeared to be intended to be an elite program for a small number of students and it was questioned whether there was any guarantee it would stay that way.

In response, the Provost pointed out that there are a number of precedents for programs that are structured somewhat outside the parameters of the modular system or have a focused area of study. The Dean of Science noted that all of the words following “integrated science” defined the honors specialization element. Breadth requirements remained the same as for all other programs and essay requirements were embedded in the courses associated with the program. Had the program been set up as an honors specialization in “x” with a minor in integrated science, the integrated science element would not appear on the diploma and an important part of the branding for the program would be lost. She pointed out that other universities with which Western competes, such as McMaster, were developing these types of programs. With respect to whether the program would remain “elite,” she noted that SCAPA had had the opposite concern and wondered whether the program might be opened up to more students who might want this “case based” approach to learning science. At this point, 60 students is the maximum that can be supported because of the very expensive labs needed. If there were to be high student demand, potential for growth could be explored. Nonetheless, given SCAPA’s remarks, the Faculty was reviewing how it might allow other students to have a taste of the program.

The question was called and CARRIED.

Mental Health Supports at Western

The President noted that he had asked the Associate Vice-President (Student Experience), J. Luker, to speak to recent news reports about wait times to see a psychiatrist at Student Health Services. To accommodate her schedule, the President asked Senate's permission for her to speak at this juncture rather than waiting until the end of the meeting under Other Business.

J. Luker noted that it was recently reported in the local media that Western's wait time for psychiatrists is 4 weeks. While this was true, she pointed out that in the broader community the wait time to see a psychiatrist is between 8-12 months. Western currently has no wait lists for other mental health supports such as psychologists, counsellors, social workers, or peer support.
